

HAIR

By Dameon Perry

When I was younger I used to love my hair, so I one day expressed my feelings to my father and said that I did not want my hair cut. After that I started growing an Afro and everything got caught in it, my toys, my brush, everything! it grew so big that I just had to cut it. This led me to think that you can express yourself and your creativity through your hair.

You can express your differences through your hair!

On the International Museum of Women website
it says, “When I am glad, happy, or sad my hair
reflects my wellbeing.”

I think that hair lets people express their differences. Matisse, a fifth grader, says that she feels like regular brown hair and black hair is boring. She wanted to choose something different like her blue hair because she thinks that it is a very unique style and it expresses her in a way because she does not like being the same.

Another reason that people like to express their differences is that I interviewed Isaac Freierman, a fifth grader, and he says that he likes his hair because it is different and he does not care what other people think. Isaac has long hair that falls below his shoulders.

One more reason I think this is because I interviewed our schools principal, Sharon Hill, and she says that she likes her hair and she does not want to be covered by her hair so that she can express herself. Sharon's hair is different in a way that it looks like it was shaved off.

Off the Top of Your Head: Self-Expression Through Hairstyles Around Campus from The Guilfordian, it says, “uncommon” hairstyles like the Mohawk and Dreadlocks are not so uncommon anymore. That is because the Mohawk can help people express themselves.

You can express your creativity through your hair!

Katerina Corr, a fifth grader at PS290 says that she has been growing her hair since she was four years old

Tara an afterschool teacher in her 20's says that she likes getting creative with her hair she says that she likes it curly, long, straight, short and she likes highlights.

Another reason I think this is because I interviewed Mrs. Markia and she said that she loves her hair because it means that she is free to be her and that her hair is healthy.

In conclusion, I think that you can express yourself through your hair and I also think that everybody can express their creativity and differences through their hair.
