

Old Buildings

By: Madison Blinoff

Some people think that old buildings should be forgotten, because they are hidden away in a corner, but some people think that they are beautiful. I think they are beautiful because they have survived a lot and they still stand tall. There are a lot of old buildings that you just walk by, and you don't notice how beautiful these buildings are. Then, when you judge old buildings, you realize that there is something beautiful in everything.

I have realized that old buildings are very important and beautiful in its own way, because they tell a story of what life was like back then when they built it. Some old buildings have a message. Usually because of a war where they lost a lot of people. They design faces and detailed designs on the front of the building to commemorate something or to remember something.

In the 19th and 20th centuries, most buildings were broken down to make space for new buildings that would live forever, like the buildings that we see now. A lot of old buildings were palaces. Most of the old buildings have gold and copper in them. Gold and copper were good sources to hold up the domes in the high ceilings. They also used dirt to hold up the ceiling.

This is a old apartment building. The brick is very red and the staircases have designs on them.

This is part of an old church. The tops of the windows are very detailed and triangular.

The cross on the front of the building represents that this building is a church.

The detailed designs above the arches of the building shows that this is an old building.

This shows that this is an apartment building because of the fire escape ladders, and the air conditioners beneath the windowsill.

Not all of this building is pretty, but the part of the building above the awning of the apartment building is old and pretty. It is ironic because the part above the awning is old, and the awning of the apartment building is very modern.

The windows on this church are very big. I like how at the top of the windows, there are big designs.

I like this building because of the different colors. One building is brown, the next building is beige and light brown, and the next building is more of a orange-red.
